Market and portfolio review

For the quarter global equities struggled; however, U.S. equities posted gains in response to Trump's re-election. Emerging-market equities fell, as did ex-U.S. developed markets. Given the positive macroeconomic backdrop, an overweight to risky assets might be beneficial. However, it is important to keep risks controlled as tight valuations limit the upside for risky assets. Anticipate volatility in the near term as markets react to geopolitical uncertainties, including the potential for tariffs, as well as shifts in the rates outlook. Expect to see market jitters in reaction to any weak economic data, especially labor data. With the idea that global economic growth is likely to improve, cyclical and small-cap equities seem enticing due to their relatively attractive valuations and greater sensitivity to the economic cycle. Developed ex-U.S. and emerging-market equities could outperform for those same reasons. As central banks cut rates, valuations should also see support from lower discount rates.

Future investment strategy

In 2025, the key question remains whether central banks can steer the world's major economies toward moderate growth while keeping inflation in check. Disinflationary progress will continue, and the global economy is expected to slow in the near term before likely re-accelerating, supported by improving real wage growth and easing monetary policy.
