Market and portfolio review

Bond markets performed poorly in March, largely driven by concerns about the potential impact of US policy in coming months. Euro-denominated government bonds were the worst performer as President Trump indicated the US may provide less support for the defense of Europe going forward. The implication of this is that European governments will need to increase defense spending, largely funded by higher debt issuance, which had the impact of driving yields higher. Indeed, during the month, the German government relaxed their strict fiscal rules to allow higher spending on defense, which kept upward pressure on German government bond yields. Credit spreads also widened over the month as concerns about tariffs and global trade caused markets to trade with a risk-off tone. Having already announced some targeted tariffs, President Trump indicated that he intends to announce a much broader set of tariffs in early April. Given the uncertainty about the extent of these tariffs and their impact on trade and global growth, equity markets fell during March. The US led the decline, while European markets held up slightly better due to expected increases in government spending in the region. Similarly, for credit markets, it was spreads on USD-denominated investment grade and high yield that widened by more than those for EUR-denominated markets. However, given the rise in eurozone government bond yields, European credit still underperformed the US in total return terms. The US Treasury market ended the slightly up, as short-end yields rallied on concerns that tariffs would lower growth. Meanwhile, AAA CLOs in both USD and EUR continued to show resilience in the face of increasing uncertainty, providing positive returns in March.

Future investment strategy

Uncertainty prevails. Following the significant news flow in February, which included heightened economic and geopolitical concerns, March felt like a month with fewer policy announcements but increasing speculation and uncertainty about future policies from the Trump administration. The uncertainty about trade policy and its impact on global growth caused markets to trade with a risk-off tone throughout the month. Tariffs, are likely to determine the direction of markets in the near term. If the policy announcements are perceived as having a bigger impact on growth than currently anticipated, then US Treasury yields, which are currently trading close to the lowest levels of the year, are likely to rally while credit spreads could widen further. However, if tariffs are less stringent than expected, then risk assets could get a boost while risk-free rates rise. Meanwhile, uncertainty remains over the ongoing conflicts in the Middle East and between Russia and Ukraine. Regardless of how those situations progress, it has become clearer that Europe needs to invest more heavily in defense, which could be relatively more beneficial for the outlook for the European economy versus the US. However, the number of known unknowns and unknown unknowns (to paraphrase the late Donald Rumsfeld) may cause investors to remain defensively positioned in the coming months until there is more clarity over the outlook.
